

OFFICIAL FRENCH REVIEW OF TWO YEARS' FIGHTING

where maintained, as well as the integrity of the Russian armies.

The end of the first year of war was the beginning of the second crisis for the allies—a munitions crisis, aggravated by a diplomatic crisis requiring new enterprises that drew on their main forces.

The advantage that time had given the allies began to tell in January. Gen. Ivanoff, commanding the Russian armies in Volhynia and Bessarabia, continued their offensive in January with the occupation of Czartorysk. The significance of this operation lay in the revelation it furnished on a refreshed and reinforced Russian army provided with new cannon, abundant supplies of projectiles and sufficient power to plow up German field defenses.

Of far greater significance was the advance in the Caucasus by Grand Duke Nicholas, forcing the fall of Erzerum, accomplishing the occupation of Kermanshah and, in the military view here, virtually eliminating Turkey as a factor in the European war, beside re-establishing the prestige of the allies in Persia.

The heroic defense of Verdun, on the other hand, has been for the allies one of the notable developments of the war. It held German reserves there in such numbers as to put an end to the shifting of troops from front to front.

In this embarrassment, as French observers view it, the central powers, ardently desiring peace, and urgently needing success to raise the spirits of the German people, depressed as they were by prolonged privations, looked to the French front and decided upon the adventure of Verdun.

The German plan seems originally to have been to concentrate artillery, munitions and men in such force over a limited length of front that the onrush would be irresistible. They chose Verdun because the position of the ancient fortress was such that

The successful defense of Verdun and the successful offensives of the allies in the north of France and on the western front show at the end of the second year of the war that the finally prepared war map on which the German chancellor held that the allies ought to accept negotiations, with the Russians occupying Bukovina and part of Galicia, the Italians recovering territory lost in the recent Austrian offensive and still in possession of the Isonzo region, and with the French and British in possession of more than 30 villages on the banks of the Somme that had been occupied by the Germans for 20 months and each of them transformed in the meantime into miniature fortresses.

The destruction of adversary forces is another and a far more difficult matter. In this war the end may be nearer than many hope or may yet be far distant. There are no bases on which to calculate the progress of military operations or the resistance of the belligerents, even when apparently doomed to defeat.

Every yard of ground gained by the Germans before Verdun since February 24 has been at an extremely heavy sanguinary cost. The continuing of so expensive and fruitless an operation has puzzled the critics. It has been advanced that the Germans persisted with the object of exhausting the French forces and preventing an offensive by the allies elsewhere.

The battle of Verdun, if ordered with the intention of interfering with the offensive plans of the allies, in nowise diminished the chances of carrying them out, whatever the fate of the discarded fortress, it having now no more significance apart from the prestige of the name than any other point along the front.

The heroic defense of Verdun, on the other hand, has been for the allies one of the notable developments of the war. It held German reserves there in such numbers as to put an end to the shifting of troops from front to front.
